At Norwich, children who are sickly are taken to a woman living in S. Lawrence to be cut for a supposed disease called the spinnage. The woman performs the operation on a Monday morning only, and charges threepence. On the first visit the woman cuts the lobe of the right ear with a pair of scissors, and with the blood makes the sign of the cross upon the child's forehead. On the second Monday she does the same with the left ear; and in some instances it is deemed necessary to subject the little sufferers to nine operations of this ridiculous ceremony (Hall.).

SPIRTLE, see Spurtle, sb.

SPIRT-NET, sb. w.Som.$^1$ A kind of fishing-net used in the pools of rapid streams; see below.

It is a shallow bag in shape, tapering off to what is called a 'purse,' made with a much finer mesh. The net is firmly attached to two strong staves about seven feet long, and reaches about half the length of the poles. These are united at one end by a chain about five or six feet long, to which also the bottom of the net is made fast, while the top of the net is strengthened by a strong cord, corresponding to the chain at the bottom. Two men are required to use it. One holding each pole keeps the net nearly upright with the chain stretched at the bottom of the pool. In this position it is drawn through the water towards the stump or overhanging bank, which forms the 'hover,' where the fish at once take shelter. Each man then pokes under the bank, disturbing and fouling the water, and at the same time brings his pole towards that of his partner. In this way the fish are disturbed, and at once dart outwards, and so into the purse. As soon as the staves are, in this fashion, brought together, both men raise the ends of their poles at the same moment, and lift the four sides of the net out of water. Called also 'two stave net.'

Sc. (A.W.), n.Yks.$^{124}$, m.Yks.$^1$ s.Chs.$^1$ Tŭ lee· dhŭ bred i spùnzh is to put the yeast to the flour. Der.$^2$, nw.Der.$^1$, Nhp.$^1$, Hnt. (T.P.F.) Nrf. Arch. (1879) III. 173. w.Som.$^1$ It is usual to mix over-night one half of the flour to be baked next morning, and in this portion to place the requisite quantity of yeast for the entire 'batch.' The flour thus mixed is kneaded much 'slacker' (q.v.) than is required for the dough, but this is to allow it to 'rise,' or properly ferment, by the morning. This first or highly leavened portion is called 'the sponge,' and to [zút dhu spuun·j] 'set the sponge' is to insert the right quantity of barm, according to the kind of flour, the temperature or the state of the weather, and is the most delicate operation in preparing the bread. In the early morning the rest of the flour is wetted and kneaded much 'tighter' than the sponge was done over-night, and all is then broken down, or thoroughly incorporated together into the great mass of dough from which the loaves are made.

SPRIGGAN, sb. Cor. [spri·gən.] A fairy, sprite; a goblin; see below.

The Spriggans . . . appear to be offshoots from the family of the Trolls of Sweden and Denmark. . . [They] are found only about the cairns, coits, or cromlechs, burrows, or detached stones, with which it is unlucky for mortals to meddle; . . they were a remarkably mischievous and thievish tribe. If ever a house was robbed, a child stolen, cattle carried away, or a building demolished, it was the work of the Spriggans. Whatever commotion took place in earth, air, or water, it was all put down as the work of these spirits. . . It is usually considered that they are the ghosts of the giants. . . [They] have the charge of buried treasure, Hunt Pop. Rom. w.Eng. (1865) 80-81, ed. 1896; Knockers and Sprig-gans, and all underground spirits, . . always heard working where there is tin (and who are said to be the ghosts of the Jews who crucified Jesus), Flk-Lore Jrn. (1886) IV. 116; She found Aichel watching her as closely as if he were some gruesome spriggan set to guard the old mill or herself, Pearce Esther Pentreath (1891) bk. w.Som.$^1$ Dev.$^1$ Took a bard out of the springal that little maester had a-teel'd, 2. nw.Dev.$^1$ The ordinary springle, or snare for birds, consists of a pliant stick, called a 'riser,' having one end stuck in the ground, and the other carrying a hair noose, the 'springle' proper. The stick is bent into the form of a bow; and the noose is passed under a staple, called a 'bridge,' and set upon a platform, or 'zwaik.' The 'zwaik' consists of a slender withy twig, 'vraithed' into the shape of a battledore, and is 'tilled' by a small catch or tiller, which bears also against the 'bridge' and 'riser.' The bait is placed upon the 'zwaik,' and when the bird pitches upon it, the catch is released and the noose is drawn up tight against the bridge, the bird being thus caught by its legs. In another form of springle, the 'riser' is bent back upon itself, and the noose is passed through a hole in it, and set by a peg, which forms also the platform for the bait. Cor.$^{12}$

2. Phr. (1) I spy the devil's eye, a boys' game; see below; (2) to spy farlies, to pry about for anything strange; to visit a house in order to observe what is going on.

(1) Der. The game was only played in the dusk, and after dark, and I never knew girls take part in it. Any number played, in two parties of equal strength, and from a base, gen. a wall or house-end. Sides were chosen by counting out, or footing, the leaders finally 'footing it' to determine which side should remain in goal (the base) for spies. The out side then ran from goal shouting 'Out! out!' and each hid himself somewhere within a distance of not less than one hundred yards from the base, the leader being the last to hide, shouting 'Ready' when he supposed all were under cover. . . The spies left goal, spreading in front to spy. One was left in goal, with discretionary power of following the spies twenty or thirty yards. The spies searched till one of the hiding party was discovered, or till one of them sprang out to capture a spy. In either case the spy shouted, 'I spy! I spy! the devil's eye! in! in! in!' It was then a chase of the out-party after the spies, who, if caught, had to carry the captors into the goal. If good generalship was shown, the whole party of spies could be led into ambush, all be caught, and the entire out-party would ride into goal. The captured spies who first got into goal with their riders ran out to meet the tardy couples, and subjected them to buffetings with caps, knotted neckcloths, or ropes' ends. The out-party then took the place of spies, and so on. Sometimes the out-party made a pretence of hiding, and, working round, tried to take possession of the base, and to prevent this was the duty of the one left as goal-keeper. If he discovered the attempt he shouted 'In, in, in! I spy, I spy!' and then . . . both parties [rushed] . . . to first possess the goal. If the out-party took possession, they mounted the backs of the spies, and rode them out from goal about fifty yards and back, N. & Q. (1890) 7th S. x. 331. A ground ash sapling with the bark on, about as thick as the little finger, pliant and tough, formed the shaft, which was about fifteen inches long. This was held upright in the middle of a tea-cup, while the mould was filled with molten lead. It soon cooled, and left a heavy conical knob on the end of the stick. If rightly thrown it was a deadly missile, and would fly almost as true as a rifle ball. A rabbit or leveret could thus be knocked over; and it was peculiarly adapted for fetching a squirrel out of a tree, because, being so heavy at one end, it rarely lodged on the boughs, as an ordinary stick would, but overbalanced and came down, Jefferies Amateur Poacher (1879) iii. e.Som. W. & J. Gl. (1873). 16. A form of the game of hide-and-seek; see below.

w.Yks. A small ring is made, in the centre of which is placed a stone, say about the size of one's fist. A boy (or girl) called the 'tenter' is left in charge of this stone. The other players may total to any number, but there are not often more than seven or eight of them. Prior to starting the game, one of the latter is chosen to kick the stone out of the ring, and whilst the tenter is running for it and putting it in the ring again, the others hastily hurry away and seek some place of hiding. The tenter now begins his search, but is careful not to go far away from his ring. Should he spy any of the players, say one called Harry Holmes, he would shout out, 'I squat Harry Holmes!' perhaps adding where he squats this boy. The tenter then runs to the stone in the ring and tries to put his foot on it before Harry Holmes has the chance to run before him and kick it out of the ring. Should Harry win this race and accomplish his object, then Harry is free to hide again, and so would any others of the players who might have been 'squatted' before Harry. The game continues till the tenter has 'squatted' all in hiding, a task that is sometimes a lengthy one, because those in hiding are all the time trying to sneak nearer the ring while the tenter is prowling round in his searches, and if they can kick the stone away whilst the tenter is not on guard—that is, has his foot on it—they liberate all whom the tenter may have 'squatted' up to that time, Leeds Merc. Suppl. (Mar. 26, 1898); w.Yks.$^5$

Lnk. A stack in the centre of the stack-yard was selected and round a part of one side a rut was marked in the earth, usually by the toe-bit of the ploughman's boot. This enclosure, not over four feet wide at the broadest part, was called the den. One of the players selected to be the catcher stood within this den, and when all the players were ready turned his face to the stack and counted out loud the numerals from one to twenty, the last with a great shout. During the count the players ran round the stacks out of sight, but no hiding nor leaving the stack-yard, this was 'not fair.' When twenty was heard one would shout 'Ready!' Then out came the catcher. He was not permitted to stand in or near the den, but went out among the stacks and caught as many players as he could before they reached the den. The great aim of those 'out' was to get into the den unseen and untouched. If all the players got in then the catcher had to try again; but when all were caught (which was seldom or ever) the last one caught was catcher for the next game. When one player was touched by the catcher, he or she had to remain in the den till the rest were all in, Gomme Games (1898) II. 211.

(3, a) Dev. A stag and a hare hunt are the rude means employed by a village community for maintaining either its standard of morals or expressing its disapprobation of petticoat rule. The stag hunt is by no means an institution of the past, it flourishes to the present day; and where the magistrates have interfered, this interference has stimulated it to larger proportions. . . The stag hunt takes place either on the wedding night of a man who has married a girl of light character, or when a wife is suspected of having played her husband false, Baring-Gould Spider (1887) xxiv; According to the traditional usage on such occasions, the hunt ends with the stag or hare, one or the other, being fagged out, and thrown at the door of the house whose inmates' conduct has occasioned the stag or hare hunt. Then the hunter stands astride over the animal, if a stag, and with a knife slits the bladder that is distended with bullock's blood, and which is thus poured out before the offenders' door, ib. xxvi. (b) Cmb. Boys and others go at night to the fields and walk, one party on one side of a hedge and another the other, and then they beat the thorns to drive out the birds, blackbirds, &c., which they then seize and sell to game dealers (W.M.B.). On Lindlow Common, near Wilmslow, there is occasionally, though rarely, cut a very peculiar kind of turf which would, I think, also rank as stake-turf. In the hollows near the old Wilmslow racecourse there are two small lakes, or, as they were locally called, 'laches,' the Black Lache and the Green Lache. In very droughty summers these lakes become nearly dry, and then the sediment, solid and black, and composed largely of humus, is exposed. This mud is several yards in thickness, but is entirely destitute of vegetable fibres. It is of a soapy texture, and will not bear cutting into flat cakes like ordinary turf; it is therefore dug out in square blocks. These are carried to the hard ground above the lakes, and are then chopped up into angular pieces and left there to dry. When dry they are used for fuel. They become very hard and black, and are hogged like potatoes, and covered with clods to keep them dry, and so retained for winter use. I believe none of this kind of turf has been got for many years.

5. An implement used to knock off the spears from barley grains.

w.Som.$^1$ It is a square frame with a number of knife-like, parallel bars fixed across it. The tool is completed by an arched iron passing from side to side of the frame, to which is fixed an upright, cross-headed handle. It is used by forcibly jumping it up and down upon the heap of grain. The use of this implement is now much declining, because in the modern process of steam thrashing the grain is well cleared of its spear by the machine.

6. A mining term: a small hole made with a pick for the insertion of a wedge in a bed of coal or stone. Nhb.$^1$ Nhb., Dur. Greenwell Coal Tr. Gl. (1849). 7. A landing-place at Wisbeach; see below.

The attendance of servants for the purpose of being hired—in the main country girls—is numerous. They range themselves on either side down the principal street (Briggate), and are there inspected and questioned by those who are in quest of servants. The great bulk are engaged by publicans, to whom decent town servants are at a discount. It is for this reason only that we are inclined to regard this ancient custom as now a source of much evil. When hired, a 'God's penny' is offered, and taken by the servant, as a mutual pledge of engagement. ne.Lan.$^{1}$ Midl. Marshall *Rur. Pirliewinkie). (4) Abd. The game represents the stealing of a woman's children and the recovery of them. The mother, before beginning to wash, disposes of her children in a safe place. . . While she is busy a child-snatcher comes and takes away one. The others begin to cry. The mother . . . tells them to be more careful for the time to come and returns to her washing. . . . This process is repeated till all the children are stolen. . . She sets out in search of them and meets a woman whom she questions if she has seen her children. She denies all knowledge of them. The mother persists and at last discovers all her stolen children. She demands them back. The stealer refuses and puts them behind her and stands on her defence. A tussle takes place. The mother in the long run rescues her children, Gomme Games (1898) II. 215. (5) Rxb. (Jam.)

(1) e.An.$^1$ Nrf. The fine silt will settle on the trap and hide the iniquitous 'steel-fall,' or common steel rat-trap, Emerson Birds (ed. 1895) 290. (2) Chs.$^1$ A hard bluish marl found below the sands and boulder clays in sinking a shaft. (3) n.Cy. The steel-mill was introduced into the north of England collieries in the latter part of the eighteenth century, and disappeared almost immediately after the introduction of the safety lamp in 1815, and they are now very rarely to be met with even by collectors of mining curiosities, Bauerman Cat. Mining Models (1865) 54. Nhb.$^1$ As the fire-damp would have instantly ignited at candles, they lighted their way by steel mills, small machines which give light by turning a plain thin cylinder of steel, Felling Explosion (1812). Nhb., Dur. A brass wheel, about 5 inches diameter, with 52 teeth, works a pinion with 11 teeth: on the axle of the latter is fixed a thin steel wheel from 5 to 6 inches in diameter. The wheels are placed in a light frame of iron, which is suspended by a leather belt round the neck of the person who plays the mill. Great velocity is given to the steel wheel by turning the handle of the toothed wheel; and the sharp edge of a flint being applied to the perimeter of the steel wheel, an abundance of sparks, and considerable light is produced, Greenwell Coal Tr. Gl. (1849). Cum. The colliers who dare not venture with a candle in spots where fire-damps are supposed to lurk, have invented a curious machine to serve the purpose of lights; it is what they call a steel-mill, consisting of a small wheel and a handle; this they turn with vast rapidity against a flint, and the great quantity of sparks emitted not only serves for a candle, but has been found of such a nature as not to set fire to the horrid vapour, Pennant, in Hutchinson Hist. Cum. (1794) II. 61.

(1) War.$^2$, se.Wor.$^1$ (2) Oxf. There are usually two players—a striker and a server. The implements used are a stick and a bail (a piece of wood sharpened at both ends). A ring is made, about $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet in diameter, and the server stands at about ten yards' distance. His object is to lodge the bail within the ring: if he does so, his opponent is 'out,' and becomes server. If the bail should lodge on the line of the ring, the striker has one stroke; if outside, three strokes. The stroke is made by striking one of the pointed ends of the bail, which causes it to rise in the air, and whilst in the air it is again struck with the stick, and sent as far as possible. The striker then declares the number of jumps in which the server is to cover the distance the bail has gone. If his opponent is unsuccessful in accomplishing the task, the striker puts the given number of jumps to his score. If, however, the server should prove successful in reaching the ring in the given number, he takes his innings at the ring, and the same process again ensues (G.O.). Some of the stints, together with a portion of common land, were awarded to every tenement in the parish according to value. We find some farms with 4, others with 14 or 15 stints. The stints are generally sold by themselves, being worth about £60 each. The stints may also be let for grazing from May 20 to Nov. 11, and they let for 44*s.* to 48*s.* each. The number of animals which a stint may carry are: one bullock, heifer, &c., of any age or size, one yearling horse, two ewes with followers (not more than two lambs apiece), four sheep of any age not having lambs, whilst two stints are necessary for one horse of any age above one year (E.W.P.); Cum.$^{14}$, Wm. (C.W.D.) ne.Yks.$^1$ In a 'stinted' pasture carrying 200 sheep, A would be said to have 50 stints, B 30, and so on, dates being fixed for stocking and clearing. w.Yks. (A.C.), w.Yks.$^1$, ne.Lan.$^1$ Lin. Streatfeild Lin. and Danes (1884) 366. Rut.$^1$, Som. (W.F.R.)

2. Phr. to throw the stocking, obs., a bridal custom; see below.

Frf. Hey! the beddin' o' the bride, An' hey! the throwin' o' the stockin', Laing Wayside Flowers (1846) 111. Lth. As the bride wi' her maids retir'd [They] proposed to throw the stocking: An' thrown it was wi' glee I trow! It hit my bonnie Leezie, Bruce Poems (1813) II. 69. Edb. The stocking was thrown, an' they ended the weddin' By drinkin' guid-night to young Wattie an' Kate, Glass Cal. Parnassus (1812) 54. Nhb.$^1$ Obs. The bride was attended by her tire women, who removed the stocking from her left leg and returned with it to the assembled guests. It was thrown among them, and luck fell on the person on whom it lighted, for it was supposed to indicate the one next to be married. Dur.$^1$ The bride used to be put to bed by the bridesmaids, and when in bed she sat up, and the bridesmaids took a stocking and, standing at the foot of the bed with their backs to the bride, threw it over the left shoulders, and the bridesmaid who hit the bride's forehead was to be married first. The present custom is to throw a shoe, and this is still done occasionally. Cum.$^4$ What! breyde forgat flingin the stokin? Anderson Codbeck Wed. st. 21. w.Yks.$^1$ When it was announced to the young guests invited to the wedding that the happy pair were retired, they instantly repaired to the bed-room, where the bride and bridegroom sat up in bed, in full dress, exclusive of their shoes and stockings. One of the bridemaids repeated an epithalamium. Afterwards she took the bridegroom's stocking, and standing at the bottom of the bed, and with her back towards it, threw the stocking with her left hand over the right shoulder, aiming at the face of the bridegroom. This was done first by all the females in rotation; and afterwards the young men took the bride's stocking, and in the same manner threw it at her face. As the best marksman was to be married first, it is easy to conceive with what eagerness and anxiety this odd ceremony was performed by each party. [Amer. Stocking-throwing and other such customs lingered long among the backwoodsmen of the Colonies, Cent. Mag. (July 1885) 393.]

3. A purse, gen. consisting of an old stocking; savings, a hoard of money.

A ring, about a foot and a half in diameter, is made on the ground. In the middle of this a small stone is placed. One boy is chosen as 'tenter'—i.e. the one who has to guard the stone. The players gather round, and one of them kicks the stone as far away as possible. Then all the players, except the 'tenter,' run away and hide. The 'tenter' hurries to bring the stone back, and places it in the middle of the ring. He then proceeds to find the rest. When he sees one, he calls out his name; thus 'Tom Smith—stone-sto'en!' at the same time running back to the ring, and putting his foot on the stone, when he calls out, 'Fooit ower!' If the player who is found can get to the ring before the 'tenter' gets his foot on the stone, and kick the stone out, then he is at liberty to go and hide again. Or if any player who is not found runs to the ring, and kicks out the stone while the 'tenter' is away, then everybody who has been found is released again, and goes away to hide. When all are found, then the one who was found first is the new tenter, Leeds Merc. Suppl. (June 11, 1898). A guardian is selected to (as it were) 'hold the fort.' From a marked distance the other boys with stones of about the same size as that set on the boulder fling at the said stone, and try to displace it, and then run up to endeavour to recover their missile. The guardian must replace the stone on the boulder before he can give chase to the assailant. If he captures him before he can get back to the line, the assailant becomes a prisoner, and must stand where caught until some other of the attacking party can fire, run, and touch the prisoner, and also recover his own missile. With a good many bombarders and only one guardian, there is often very hot work (A.W.).

STOOL-BALL, sb. Irel. Lan. Glo. Sus. Wil. Som. Also in form stobball Glo. Wil.$^1$ Som. A game resembling cricket; see below.

Ir. The game is described as being played as follows: Three or more players on each side, two stones (or holes) defended by batsmen, one 'lobber' to throw stick (or ball); when stick is hit batsmen change places; each is out if stick hits stone, or is caught, or hits stone while boys change places; game is won by runs. Sometimes two lobbers lob in turn from each end, Flk-Lore Jrn. (1884) II. 319. Lan. It . . . appears to be a game among Lancashire children to this day. A stool is used as a wicket, at which it is attempted to throw the ball; a player stands near the stool, and using his or her hand as a bat, wards off the blow. If the ball hits the stool the thrower takes the place at the wicket; or if the ball is caught the catcher becomes the guardian of the stool, Gomme Games (1898) II. 220. n.Glo. Aubrey Nat. Hist. (c. 1680) 347, in (Hall.). Sus. This game is still played in almost every village in Sussex, and is for ladies . . . exactly what cricket is to men. Two pieces of board 18 inches by 12 are fixed to two sticks from 3 to 4 feet high, according to the age of the players. These sticks are stuck in the ground sloping a little backwards, and from 10 to 15 yards apart. The players take sides, generally eight to ten each. The ball is the common white ball sold in the shops for trap-ball, and the bat very much like the same. The bowler pitches the ball at the board. . . If he hits it the player is out. The same is the case if the ball is caught; and the running out, stumping, &c. are exactly like cricket, N. & Q. (1867) 3rd S. xi. 457–8; It is supposed to derive its name from being played by milk-maids when they returned from milking. Their stools were (I think) used as wickets, Gomme ib. 219; Sus.$^1$, Wil.$^1$ Obs. n.Wil., Som. They strike a ball stuffed very hard with quills, and covered with soale-leather, . . with a staffe commonly made of withy about three and a halfe feet long. Der. It is constructed of seven pieces of timber, namely, two bearers of flat wood $1\frac{1}{2}$ feet long, called sole-trees; two others about one foot long, called hing benches, which are laid over the ends of the former, and to which they are pinned at the corners with wooden pins (if they are nailed they are not properly constructed, and the machine is not by custom a possession, nor will it confer one); two upright pieces of wood called stow-blades, about one foot long, which are morticed into the middle of the sole and under-pinned; they have a nick in the top like an arrow's head, called a stow, and about the middle of them going between and through them both is a piece of wood called a spindle or turn-tree, by which the earth or mine is drawn out of the pit. . . The stowe . . . is called a possession, because by placing two of them 'in all men's sight' upon a meer of ground . . . they confer as . . . good a right thereto as a deed of conveyance does to a purchaser, Tapping Gl. to Manlove (1851); Make stows, and keep the heavy hours alive, Furness Medic. (1836) 15; Mawe Mineralogy (1802); Der.$^1$

STRATHSPEY, sb. Sc. Irel. [stra·þspē.] A Highland dance, somewhat resembling the Highland Fling; the music of a Highland dance. See below.

Sc. Not unlike the Highland Fling in time and measure is the Strathspey, so called from the district whence it originated. In the beginning of this century it was called a 'twasome' dance, because it was first danced by two persons; nowadays it is a 'foursome,' usually two ladies and two gentlemen taking part. It is divided into two sections, the first or 'reel' consisting of eight bars, and the second, or 'setting step,' of eight bars. The ladies standing on the right lead off the dance after the introductory bowing to partners; in doing the 'reel' part, in moving to the right, the right foot is advanced, followed closely by the left, then the left foot is brought down behind, and the right raised, then two hops, concluding with the same 'setting step' as the Highland Fling, Forbes Dances Highlanders, in Windsor Mag. (May 1900) 748; The best dancer of a strathspey in the whole strath, Scott Waverley (1814) xviii; Otherwise called a twa-sum dance (Jam.). Kcd. Ye lively lilt our ain strathspeys, Jamie Effusions (1849) 83. Rnf. Dancing strathspeys and quadrilles, Barr Poems (1861) 114. Ayr. When thro' his dear strathspeys they bore with Highland rage, Burns Brigs of Ayr (1787) l. 104. Bwk. Blithe strathspey, Calder Poems (1897) 62. Dmf. Reels and Strathspeys,—dear to the heart of all Scottish dancers, Paton Castlebraes (1898) 65. Gall. Played both reels and strathspeys, Crockett Grey Man (1896) 267. Don. His friends were loud for jigs and strathspeys, Macmanus Bend of Road (1898) 26.

Lin.$^{1}$ [stai; stī.] 1. A ladder; a stair.

N.Cy.$^{12}$ Nhb.$^{1}$ A ladder used as a stair in farm houses. The servants' attic rooms in old houses are usually reached by a stee from the kitchen. Dur.$^{1}$, Lakel.$^{12}$ Cum. Young filly's dung owre the lang stee, ANDERSON Ballads (ed. 1808) 183; Cum.$^{14}$ Wm. Block ran up a stee, WHEELER Dial. (1790) 75; (E.C.H.), n.Yks.$^{1234}$, ne.Yks.$^{1}$, e.Yks. (Miss A.), e.Yks.$^{1}$ w.Yks. P$^{d}$ pro 3 stighs, 10*s.* 4*d.*, Bradford Parish Acc. (1713); w.Yks.$^{1}$ Sall .... hed nout else to do bud clim th' stee, an he hard efter her, ii. 287; w.Yks.$^{2345}$ Lan. (HALL.); Two on um carrid a steeigh o' ther shilders, TIM BOBBIN View Dial. (ed. 1740) 14; GROSE (1790) MS. add. (C.); Lan.$^{1}$, n.Lan.$^{1}$, ne.Lan.$^{1}$, s.Lan.$^{1}$, Not.$^{2}$ Lin. Hen-stee, the ladder by which fowls ascend to their roosting-place, STREATFEILD Lin. and Danes (1884) 337; (J.C.W.), Lin.$^{1}$ n.Lin.$^{1}$ If I live anuther year I'll hev a new stee maade for th' chech steeple. Nhp. (C.A.M.)

Hence (1) Sty-head, sb. the top of a ladder; (2) -room, sb. a yard of ground left at the outside of a property adjoining another's to allow room for placing a ladder; (3) -stower, sb. the rung of a ladder; (4) -top, sb., see (1).

(1) Cum. (J.S.O.) (2) Cum. In days when thatched roofs were the common rule in villages, and the repairs caused much disorder to the next tenement. There are instances of such reserve, though never wide enough for a ladder to stand safely on, and it may be seen by the line of property, where a building has been placed so as to leave a stee-room between it and its neighbours. The town-jury used to be summoned to decide such matters in my recollection, and once, where there had not been a roof for 50 years, decreed that 'a stee-room should be left green-side up,' for a barn-wall, built to the extent of the owner's property (M.P.). (3) w.Yks. We nobbled his heead we an' oade stee stower, BLACKAH Poems (1867) 39; LUCAS Stud. Nidderdale (c. 1882) 280. (4) w.Yks. Hod th' stee-top while I clamber up, SUTCLIFFE Shameless Wayne (1900) 102.

2. Phr. I climb the sty, a game of marbles; see below.

w.Yks. One of the players pulls a number of taws out of his pocket, and presenting his closed hand downwards to the other player, says: 'I climb t'stee, Hahmdy [how many] may ther be?' If the guess be six, and there are only four, two taws are due from the guesser to the other; if four are guessed, and there are four, the guesser takes the lot. So the game continues by turns, Leeds Merc. Suppl. (Apr. 30, 1898).

3. A stile; steps leading over a fence.

n.Cy. HOLLOWAY. n.Yks.$^{4}$ ne.Yks.$^{1}$ Wilt tha set ma ti t'stee? w.Yks. O'er a stee by t'laylac tree, SENIOR Smithy Rhymes (1882) 50; w.Yks.$^{124}$, Lan.$^{1}$, n.Lan.$^{1}$, s.Lan.$^{1}$, Der.$^{1}$, Lin. (J.C.W.), n.Lin.$^{1}$ Obs.

Hence Sty-hole, sb. a stile.

4. v. To cover with grass; to convert arable land into pasture.

sw.Lin.$^1$ It won't swarthe itself. It was ploughed, but they've swarthed it down.

Hence Swarthing, sb. grass-land. n.Yks.$^2$ (s.v. Swath). 5. Phr. to swarth a mower, to encumber him with the next cut of grass.

Chs.$^1$ Now and then it is done in the hayfield as a practical joke, or to show off the prowess of the leading mower. When two men are mowing together the strongest man generally leads, and occasionally, to show his strength, he will push on faster than his mate can follow, and having come to the end of his cut, he will return and follow up the other till he catches him, and throws his swarth in his way. This is called swarthing him, and it is an indignity which is seldom forgiven.

SWARTH, sb.$^2$ n.Cy. Lakel. Cum. Yks. Also in forms swaith Cum.$^{24}$; swaithe n.Cy.; swath N.Cy.$^1$; sworth Cum. [swarþ; swēþ.] 1. The apparition of a person at the moment of his death; the apparition of a living person. Cf. waff.

The whole apparatus now used for spinning are the sweery, the spinning wheel, and the reel. The sweery is a frame with a moveable wire fixed in it, on which are run all the pirns, empty and full—not in use on the wheel. When the pirn on the wheel is full it is taken off the 'flee,' placed in the sweery, and an empty one taken off and placed on the 'flee' again. When this is also full it is put back in the sweery, and the contents of both pirns are then twisted together on a third pirn which has been placed in the 'flee,' the rim of the wheel being turned in the direction contrary to that by which the strands . . . are spun, *Sh. Chs.$^1$; sweord Nhb.$^1$; swerd Shr.$^1$; swird S. & Ork.$^1$ [soərd, soəd; swəd.] 1. In comb. (1) Sword-dance or -dancing, see below; (2) -dancer, a person who takes part in a 'sword-dance'; (3) -grass, (a) a name given to various species of grass or flags growing near water, esp. the reed canary-grass, Phalaris arundinacea; (b) a kind of coarse sedge; (4) -slipings, in phr. to be at sword-slipings, to be at daggers drawn; (5) -slipper, (a) obs., a sword-cutler; (b) a hot-tempered person.

(1) Sc. The Sword-dance can be performed in three ways. The first is the 'grand dance,' used only on specially solemn occasions; the second is a test of skill and agility between two or more dancers, and the third or present day method is an exhibition of dancing by one person alone. This form of the dance is divided into nine distinct 'figures,' there being several 'sets' or varieties of the modern Sword-dance. First of all, the claymores, or Highland broadswords, are laid crosswise on the ground, and the dancer stands between the points facing the centre and in the first position, namely, the right heel against the ball of the left toe; he holds himself erect and perfectly free, so that he can always look down with ease at the centre of the crossed swords... In this first 'figure' there are four bars, equal to eight beats; in the first bar you advance the right foot about six inches to the right in two beats of the music, next place the heel of the left foot against the ball of the right toe in one beat, slightly bending the right knee, then raise the right foot; now place the right foot down again in the same position in one beat, and half a bar is completed, to be followed by the left foot advancing instead of the right. In the second bar the same steps are repeated; .. the third bar is exactly the same as the second; the dancer having completed this in twenty-four beats is ready for the fourth and final bar, Windsor Mag. (May 1900) 747. S. & Ork.$^1$ A dramatic martial dance performed by seven men in armour, representing the seven champions of Europe. n.Cy. (J.L. 1783), N.Cy.$^1$ Nhb., Dur. There is a very singular custom, called sword-dancing, prevalent . . . during the Christmas holidays... Two conspicuous characters [are] invariably attached to the company, and denominated . . . the Tommy (or fool) and the Bessy, .. the former being usually clad in the skin of some wild animal, and the latter in petticoats and the costume of an old woman. . . A fiddler also is an indispensable attaché. . . They sometimes [go] round amongst the towns and hamlets, exhibiting their dance before the inhabitants... This . . . bears some resemblance to an ordinary quadrille dance, with this difference, that the sword dancers are each furnished with long steel wands which they call swords, and which they employ with a very peculiar and beautiful effect during the dance. The dance is sometimes accompanied with a song, and a fragment of dramatic action. [The characters are introduced by the singer] and then the sword-dance takes place, in which one of them is killed. . . The doctor is introduced, and a dialogue of some length takes place, which terminates in his restoring the dead man to life (Hall.). Dur.$^1$ Cum.$^4$ When the sword dance com' on They lockt an' meade a bummel, Lonsdale Upshot, st. 27. n.Yks. The Sword dance is performed from St. Stephen's Day till New Year's Day. The dancers usually consist of six youths dressed in white with ribands, attended by a fiddler, a youth with the name of 'Bessy,' and also by one who personates a doctor. They travel from village to village. One of the six youths acts the part of king in a kind of farce, which consists chiefly of singing and dancing, when the Bessy interferes while they are making a hexagon with their swords and is killed, Brand Pop. Antiq. (ed. 1813) I. 401; n.Yks.$^1$ w.Yks. The graceful and martial sword dance is yet practised at Christmas tide by the young men of the Dale, Lucas Stud. Nidderdale (c. 1882) 45. On these occasions they are habited in a peculiarly gaudy dress... Instead of their ordinary jackets they wear others, composed of a kind of variegated patchwork, which, with their hats, are profusely decorated with ribands (Hall.). Dur.$^1$ n.Yks.$^1$ A party of performers consisting of six dancers, a king, one clown or perhaps two, called Bessy, Madge, or Madgipeg, a musician, and possibly other actors, who together practise the sword-dance; n.Yks.$^4$ It may be the sword-dancers are announced; if so, their quaint performance is gone through, they are served with 'summat to keep 'em warm,' and a few coppers, 69. ne.Yks.$^1$ Seldom seen now except about Plough Monday. w.Yks.$^1$ (3, a) Cum. (B. & H.), Chs.$^1$, n.Lin.$^1$ (b) Lin. Large ant-hills, producing sour, coarse, husky sedge, or sword-grass, Reports Agric. (1793–1813) 74.
